The federal government has been seizing power by rewriting the Supreme Law of the Land, the Constitution. This book exposes how the government has been doing this and what it means for our freedoms.

How the Government Has Been Rewriting the Constitution

The government has been rewriting the Constitution through a process called "judicial review." This process allows the Supreme Court to declare laws unconstitutional. However, the Court has also been using judicial review to rewrite the Constitution itself.

For example, in the 1937 case of West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, the Supreme Court upheld a minimum wage law. The Court did this by overturning a previous decision that had held that such laws were unconstitutional. In doing so, the Court effectively rewrote the Constitution to allow for the regulation of wages.

The government has also been rewriting the Constitution through the use of executive Free Downloads. Executive Free Downloads are directives issued by the president that have the force of law. Presidents have used executive Free Downloads to create new agencies, implement new policies, and even declare war.

For example, in 2012, President Obama issued an executive Free Download creating the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program. DACA allows undocumented immigrants who came to the United States as children to stay in the country and work legally.

The Consequences of the Government's Actions

The government's actions have had a number of consequences, including:

- The erosion of our freedoms. The government has used its power to rewrite the Constitution to erode our freedoms. For example, the government has used judicial review to uphold laws that restrict our freedom of speech, our freedom of religion, and our right to bear arms.
- The concentration of power in the federal government. The government's actions have led to the concentration of power in the federal government. The federal government now has the power to regulate almost every aspect of our lives.
- The loss of our self-government. The government's actions have led to the loss of our self-government. We are now governed by a distant and unaccountable bureaucracy.

What We Can Do

There are a number of things we can do to stop the government's seizure of power, including:

- Educating ourselves about the Constitution. The first step to stopping the government's seizure of power is to educate ourselves about the Constitution. We need to understand our rights and how the government is violating them.
- Supporting organizations that are fighting for our freedoms. There are a number of organizations that are fighting for our freedoms. We need to support these organizations with our time and money.
- Getting involved in politics. We need to get involved in politics to elect representatives who will fight for our freedoms.

The government's seizure of power is a serious threat to our freedoms. We need to take action to stop it.
